 NIDA – K01

Drug use disparities among Hispanics: elucidating the complex interactions between socio-cultural, neurocognitive and drug use-related factors. Socio-cultural and neurocognitive factors are important and potentially modifiable determinants of drug use, yet research examining the how these factors interact to explain drug use disparities is scarce. The proposed K01 training will support a Hispanic new and early-stage investigator to become an independent researcher and a leader in interdisciplinary research on drug use disparities. Specifically, the outlined project will contribute to understand how social factors, Hispanic cultural values, neurocognitive processes and drug use related factors interact to explain the adverse drug use outcomes seen in the growing and heterogeneous Hispanic population, which is essential to design effective drug use preventive interventions.

Evolution of Psychopathology in the Population (ECA Follow-up Study). This project is a longitudinal elaboration of the original Epidemiologic Catchment Area household population sample surveyed in 1981, with that fieldwork under the direction of J. Anthony. The focus is upon analyses of the longitudinal data, integration of genetics research in the observational research design, and a focus on long term outcomes of cannabis smoking among adults originally studied in the early 1980s (e.g., premature mortality; excess risk of adverse mental health outcomes; drug dependence trajectories).
